A. Conclusion

From the previous chapter, it can be concluded that plot is a series of related to events or episodes that make up a story. The plot is rendering and ordering of the events and of a story, particularly towards the achievement of some particular artistic or emotional effect. Plot can be divided into four element. They are exposition, complication, climax or turning point, and resolution. The first exposition is to introduce the characters, which is usually a physical description or characterization, designation or recognition setting, time of occurrence, as well as the conflict gradually have also begun to appear. The second, complication is sometimes referred to as the rising action. In this stage, the conflict is develop gradually and intensified. Complication happen when the main character get disturbed, obstacles in achieving the goal. The third, climax or turning point is highest point of interest of the story, the point of emotion, and the greatest attention and thrilling, when difficulties or problems are encountered and resolved. The last, resolution is the final section of the story it reveals the outcome of the conflict and establishes some new stability, It can also be said that the ending is the completion of a story.
